As a salesman, the advertising space of any firm has the advantage over all other means. It does not impose itself upon the reader, and if it invites attention and the time is inopportune it is laid by until a more auspicious moment; it neither sticks nor grumbles, gives offence nor creates prejudices. If it is written in a clear and definite style the reader may fully inform himself before he starts for the store. When he gets there he is prepared to call for the article he wants and to hand over the price to the clerk without asking a score or more of questions and delivering a few nettling remarks. The art of advertising consists chiefly in telling the reader just what every customer likes to know concerning the character or quality of the goods and the price. Do not use big words in describing light goods, for the reader will not use the dictionary or care what it is all about if it is made unintelligible to him. People like to make up their minds as to purchases before they leave home and they can readily do it if the announcements are made clear and the prices impressing.
